SUMMARY

This course will cover the significant events and supranational organizations that have shaped the world since World War II. The focus will be on the historical development of national states –as members of current international institutions– and the creation of identity markers. Attention will be paid to the significance of languages and linguistic policies in these institutions, especially in the European Union. Translation and interpretation challenges in institutional and public service settings will also be discussed.

LEARNING OUTCOMES (RD 1393/2007) // NO CONTENT (RD 822/2021)

The intended learning outcomes include the whole set of abilities that define the general competencies mentioned in the degree. These involve recognizing and respecting diversity and multiculturalism, gathering and analysing pertinent information, collaborating in interdisciplinary teams within a global setting, and managing projects effectively. Specific skills that would be developed as part of these outcomes include:

- Knowledge of the two cultural areas' social, economic and political institutions and their application in translation and interlinguistic mediation tasks.
- Knowledge of the main aspects of international relations in the 20th century up to the present.

DESCRIPTION OF CONTENTS

1. 1.- Contemporary institutions: concept, objectives, characteristics and functions

Defining contemporary institution. Social, political and economic organizations in today's world. National states and national languages

2. 2.- The world after the Second World War

The significant changes after World War II that reshaped power distribution and international relations, leading to the Cold War.

3. 3.- The United Nations (UN)

The UN and the construction of the international system after World War II.

4. 4.- International economic institutions

The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. The evolution of the capitalist economy in the second half of the 20th century: financial capitalism.

5. 5.- The European Union (EU) and its institutions

The European identity and the European integration process. The significance of language in building the concept of Europe and the EU.

6. 6.- Translating and Interpreting in institutional and public service settings

The social and practical growing importance of translation and interpretation in institutional and public service settings.

TEACHING METHODOLOGY

The scheduled training activities involve face-to-face theoretical-expository lessons and giving an oral presentation or writing short essays on the topics covered in the course. While these activities can be done individually, doing them in small groups is recommended to promote collaboration and the exchange of different viewpoints. The non-face-to-face portion of the course includes required and optional readings, attendance at academic events related to the subject, participation in workgroup meetings, and consultations during tutoring sessions.

EVALUATION

Evaluation criteria for assessing students' performance in this course:

1. Final written exam consisting of reflection, analysis and synthesis questions. This exam accounts for 60% of the final grade.
2. Completion and presentation of a reflective assignment on a specific topic. The guidelines for this group project will be given on the first day of class. This assignment accounts for 30% of the final grade. If plagiarism is detected (copying from unmentioned sources such as books, assignments, or the Internet), it will directly determine the project's failing grade (a mark of 0).
3. Class attendance and participation. Active participation in class through oral comments and engaging in discussions on the recommended readings will be highly valued. It accounts for 10% of the final grade.

To pass the subject, students must achieve a minimum grade of 5 on the individual written exam and the presented group work. Within the academic standards, oral and written expression skills are relevant in determining the final grade.

NB: At the start of the course, the teacher will specify which activities and assessment percentages will be considered "non-recoverable" in the second call.
