SUMMARY

The rise of populism, the recession of democracy in the world, the new geopolitical balances and the power acquired by the big technologies, raise new issues of an ethical, political, geostrategic and economic nature that are currently the subject of debate, both in the academy as well as in different national and international forums:

How can we face the crisis of democracy?

What proposals are there to articulate a cosmopolitan citizenship in a global context of democratic recession?

Phenomena such as the pandemic or economic crises, do they justify that we have to prioritize technocratic paths over democratic ones as a way to solve global problems?

In the post-national constellation confirmed by the new transnational political entities, such as the European Union, and the economic ones, such as the great technological ones, have the ideas of democracy and popular sovereignty also lost their validity?

What development model can best contribute to eradicating poverty?

Is development cooperation enough or do we have to transition to an imperative of solidarity?

What motivations drive the subjects in the consumption of goods and in the behavior on the Internet?

This course tries to answer these and other questions. To do so, the subject is divided into two parts:

In the first part aspects related to cosmopolitanism, geopolitics and the crisis of democracy on the world scene are addressed. Various theories of cosmopolitan citizenship will be examined; we will analyze the methods of populism to manipulate public discourse, undermine democracy and transition to illiberal systems; we will evaluate the functioning of the different forums and transnational institutions; We will learn how the decisions of technocratic organizations respond to geopolitical interests and how those decisions are perceived by citizens. Finally, we will expose the democratization processes developed in poor countries.

In the second part of the course, different dimensions of development ethics are addressed. Among others, we will examine the social, psychological and neural bases of poverty. We will analyze the phenomenon of aporophobia and its reverse, status protection. We will evaluate the theory of capabilities; measures to eliminate poverty, such as basic income, as well as the conditions that make a dignified life possible. On the other hand, the psychological trends that underlie the dynamics of consumption of market goods in capitalist society will be connected with the psychological bases of human behavior in the digital environment and that produce social pathologies, such as online lynching or exhibitionism. moral. Finally, the relationship between development and democracy will be studied; the role of cooperation aid within the framework of foreign action policies; or alternative development models thought from poor countries.
