SUMMARY

Modernity is characterized by being the age of human rights. Beyond the strictly legal sphere, the study and promotion of human rights today requires an interdisciplinary integration that involves recovering the value of solidarity and emphasizing its role in the discourse of rights. This course examines the main classic and contemporary debates around human rights and presents the most relevant controversies, linking theoretical paradigms, empirical approaches and practical aspects to provide students with a conceptual, methodological and applied framework that contributes to the knowledge of human rights.

The general objective of the course is the detailed study of the foundations, characteristics, formulations and institutional materializations of human rights, with the purpose that the students understand the inalienable nuclear and referential character of human rights in the articulation of social life and politics both locally and internationally; assume the problematic, dynamic and complex character of the foundation, characterization, formulation and realization of human rights; learn about the institutional resources for the defense of human rights; and lastly, apply human rights to specific social and political arenas.

TEACHING METHODOLOGY

This course is a research seminar. In their autonomous study time, students must prepare and study the programme topics in depth using the materials listed in the subject course plan. This course requires all members to contribute to the content of the seminar by offering critical analyses of the assigned readings and by sharing their own research questions and findings. Other activities, such as conferences, round tables, workshops, meetings and the development of service learning actions, will be proposed.

EVALUATION

The evaluation will be continuous, flexible and personalized, so that the students will establish a work plan according to their area of specialization, research interests and professional experience. The evaluation criteria include the following categories:

-Critical analysis capacity and clarity in the presentations (25%).

Each student will write two short essays (around 1000 words each), based on the recommended readings, which will be sent one week before the class.

-Attendance and significant participation (25%).

Each student will submit two constructive criticisms of their peers (around 500 words each), which will be sent before the class.

-Final research paper (50%).

The final research paper (3000-5000 words) should focus on one particular human right. Students will choose between the following options:

Option A: Bibliographic review on the state of art of a specific human right.

Option B: Development of a service-learning project to promote human rights. Students can work in teams and under the supervision of the instructor. The project can be publicized through a short video (5-10 minutes) or the experiences and reflections raised during its development can be collected in a personal journal.

All writing assignments should be half-spaced, typed with 2.5 cm margins on the top and bottom, 3 cm margins on the right and left, and 12 point Times New Roman 12. Footnotes should be single-spaced at 10 points Times New Roman. Bibliography should be one space and 11 point Times New Roman.
